How can you tell if someone is facebook stalking

Occasionally, we've all been guilty of a little "Facebook stalking." We can view the public profiles of others (or whatever elements are public), sifting through their photos, status updates, and more. It feels like peeking into someone's private life just a bit; the modern equivalent of spying on a neighbour over the fence. This Facebook stalking can be quite entertaining—and no doubt it satisfies the detective in us in some instances. But there's a blissful anonymity when browsing Facebook. Whether you're continually checking in on an ex, or simply finding yourself lost in the profiles of strangers (a friend of a friend of a friend), it is nice knowing that you can continue this habit without being caught. Or can you? What if there was a tool that revealed your profile viewing habits to the public, or even just to the person you're spying on? You've likely seen one of the many websites and apps out there which claim to do just that. "See who is stalking you," they claim. "Find out who's viewing you!" These apps purportedly give people the opportunity to see who most frequently views their Facebook profile, naming and shaming. If such tools work effectively, this is alarming. It means the end of anonymous Facebook stalking, and honestly, it may turn Facebook into a very different type of social network. Fortunately (or perhaps, unfortunately, depending on your viewpoint), there is no way to see who viewed your Facebook profile. Though these apps continue to appear in droves, they definitely do not work, and Facebook has confirmed that this is the case. For some of you, this means you can Facebook stalk with immunity. On the other hand, if you're worried about strangers or unwanted persons checking up on you, however, it's best to set your privacy settings to their most secure. So, if these tools don't serve their supposed purpose, what are these websites and apps really up to? The Hidden Purpose of "See-Who-Viewed-Your-Profile" Apps It should come as no surprise that these apps exist—and that many, many people fall for their promises. After all, we as humans are innately curious. Who wouldn't want to see who was regularly checking out their Facebook profile? It could show you if you have a secret admirer, an envious friend, or an ex that just can't seem to get over you. Knowing this, such apps and tools appear over and over, luring us in with promises of revealing this hidden data. But since we already know they don't work, what is it that they are really doing? Generally, it isn't so good. Most of the time, these apps are sketchily gathering some of your personal data. It's not purely nefarious, and typically isn't aiming to gather your financial details or anything, but instead, the third-party app is trying to capture advertising data and the like, and likely sending you spam. In some instances, these apps may be more malicious, infecting your devices with malware. In any event, these apps are nothing but a scam. There is no way to circumvent the restrictions that Facebook has surrounding this confidential data. Although Facebook certainly has had some data and security issues cropping up in the past few years, revealing your private activity to other users, fortunately, isn't one of them. If you've already granted permission to an app like this, you can revoke it now to avoid any potential issues. See: How to Revoke Facebook App Permissions. Facebook also asks that report these kinds of apps to them if you spot them. What Facebook DOES Track Despite not showing your profile views to users, Facebook does, in fact, track a great deal of information. You agree to this data collection when you sign up to use the platform, by the way, but have you ever stopped to investigate what is really being tracked? If you want a blow-by-blow, Facebook is required—because of GDPR regulations—to provide you with an archive of all of your data. But for most of us, this won't be necessary. Mostly, Facebook tracks our demographics and interests for advertising purposes. (No wonder we're seeing such incredibly targeted advertisements on our feeds). For a bit more detail on the personal data Facebook mines, you can read this article. Viewing Your Activity & Friendships Facebook does track and aggregate some of your data in a way that can be helpful to you as a user. For instance, your Activity Log displays all of your recent (public) activity on the platform. This shows you things like what photos you've recently liked or commented on, places you've "checked into" and more. This section is searchable, too, so you can find past activity you may be looking for. Facebook also shows pairs of users their friendship history. When you're on a friend's Facebook profile, you can click the button with three dots (found along the bottom right of their header photo when on a desktop). A drop-down menu will appear and you can choose View Friendship. This will show you photos you're both tagged in together as well as notable wall posts, etc. It's a great way to reminisce about your friendship and look back over your years on Facebook. It might be one of Facebook's more wholesome features. The Conclusion Ultimately, it seems that Facebook has our profile views (both incoming and outgoing) locked down tight. For now, you can Facebook stalk with ease. But beware of those oh-so-tempting apps that promise you hidden information. Remember, these apps and websites don't work, and in all likelihood, they are stealing your data or even infecting you with malware. It's always best to proceed with caution when dealing with any third-party apps on Facebook. Do you wish you could find out who is checking out your profile? Have you ever wondered if you could find out who all visited your Facebook profile? If yes, then you can find your online stalkers by following a few simple steps. Currently, there are two ways using which you can find which friends are stalking your Facebook profile. However, one of the options is limited to only iOS users of the Facebook app. Here's how you can find who visited your Facebook profile: Option 1 for iOS users: Facebook is offering the facility to iOS users to find out who visited their profile on its flagship app within the 'Privacy' settings. If you are an iOS user, all you need to do is go to Privacy Shortcuts, wherein you need to select the "Who viewed my profile" option. Upon selecting the option, you can find out who all stalked your Facebook profile. However, the catch here is that you won't be able to find it when your Facebook friend visited your profile. The feature is available to iOS users since 2018. However, the social media giant is yet to roll out the feature for Android users. The company hasn't officially even revealed when or if it's planning to bring the feature for Android customers. Option 2 for all users: For the second method, Facebook users can use any browser on their desktops or laptops to find who stalked their profile. 1. All they need to do is visit Facebook.com and right-click on the web page. 2. From all the selected options, users need to click on 'View Page Source'. 3. Search for BUDDY_ID. Alongside, the BUDDY_ID tag, you'll find a 15-digit number, which is basically the Facebook profile ID of all your friends who have visited your profile. 4. In the next step, go to facebook.com/15 digit profile ID and click Enter. You'll be able to see the Facebook profile of the friend who stalked your profile. By Joanna Polisena | Creatas/Creatas/Getty Images With more than a billion users making more than 150 billion connections via computer and mobile devices, Facebook makes it easy to keep up with friends, family and acquaintances through news feeds, groups and Timelines, all of which provide access to photos and other details of your life. While you may welcome friends and family stalking you -- that is, frequently viewing what you post -- that information can put you at risk with stalking strangers. Improve your security by identifying and eliminating possible Facebook stalkers. Facebook says it is impossible to know if someone quietly stalks your profile, activity log and photos. While some websites suggest viewing your Top Friends, Facebook Search and using other tools to see who shows up first when trying to identify your stalkers, those who appear at the top of those lists are more likely people with whom you interact most. So, unless your quiet stalker visits your Timeline and pictures frequently enough to surpass your best friends and family in Facebook's tracking algorithms, a stranger or acquaintance is not likely to appear in the top slots. Facebook assures that no third-party application can identify those who view your Timeline and other data, and that you should report any application claiming to do so. Some of these third-party apps go beyond being a basic scam; they can be malicious, posing a danger to your account and computer. However, applications such as On the Rebound claim their software can get inside some Facebook data, helping people stalk. This particular app searches the Timelines of the stalker's friends to provide you information about who is single and likely to "hook up." You can spot those not-so-quiet stalkers when their name pops up as a like or comment on your posts too frequently for an acquaintance. They may also comment on things that only a close friend or family member normally would, such as pictures of your kids or a vent about a bad day at the office. Acquaintances who become stalkers may send you multiple messages, even when you didn't respond to previous contact attempts. When it comes to instant messages, your best bet is to ignore people you don't know. Finally, comments from acquaintances on pictures or posts from months ago should cause some concern. Be leery of any friend request from strangers who have no common friends or who have new accounts. Anyone can pose as any individual when behind a computer screen, and efforts to increase your popularity by becoming friends with strangers could expose you to a stalker. New York City detectives have admitted to creating fake Facebook accounts to keep tabs on at-risk teens. They create an account for an attractive young woman and blast out friend requests. As a friend, they attempt to dissuade youths from committing robberies and other crime. If you de-friend someone on suspicion that she is stalking you, and she immediately sends another friend request, use the block feature and hope that's the last you'll hear from her.
